PERILS OF THE CANYON ABOVE WHITE HORSE RAPIDS.

The Big Mosquito of Alaska—She is Larger Than the Jersey Pest, but Not So Lively—Befriending an Injured Dog—Curious Sights Along the Trail—Viewing the Famous Rapids.

White Horse Rapids, June 22.

After consulting many expert river boatmen, several of whom had navigated the canyon and White Horse rapids, we reluctantly decided that our scow was not safe for the present low water, so we disposed of our first product as boat builders, and I had nothing to show for my labor save a cut in the knee from the draw shave and the novel experience. Then we arranged to go on with a party who had already built a strong boat of about five tons burden.

Thus at last we were about to take open water for 60 miles or so at least. The morning is clear and cold as we finish loading and step from the thick ice at Lake Marsh to the boat in the open water, and with four men at the oars, one at the stern and my wife and myself in the bow we proceed down the river.

Perhaps it is the fine scenery that causes our watchfulness to lapse. The hills are less grand than those we have passed, but the masterpieces of nature are still at every hand. There are cleared fields that might have been tilled by farmers, great bowlders that look like well preserved castles and cathedrals, rows of giant medallions set in high river banks, and mounds so smooth that they might have been turned with a lathe, yet civilized man has never set foot on the soil.

At all events we soon find ourselves where the channel divides, and despite our tardy efforts, we are carried into the wrong one. There is a lurch, a harsh raking of the bottom of the boat, a career and a sudden stop. We are fast upon a rock. I wear the longest legged wading boots, so I plunge into the icy current that is so strong it almost sweeps my limbs from under me, but we must do something more besides getting away. We must learn where the deepest channel is below, so as not to invite further disaster. With my long salmon spear handle I cautiously sound the stream to determine the direction we must proceed if indeed we are fortunate enough to get off the rock. Returning to the boat, the oarsmen use their paddles while I make a mighty effort to lift the boat up on one side. But it is of no use. She will not budge. Finally one of boatmen, a giant in stature and strength, leaps overboard and our combined strength enables us to get clear and spring into the boat before she is taken down stream out of our reach. It is not what might be called a pleasant experience at the outset of our water journey. There are shallow places below where the river is far more dangerous, and an ice-water bath is too exhilarating even in a prohibition country, especially when a change of clothing cannot be considered. We halt for dinner where firewood seems most plenty and which is fairly well sheltered from the wind. While we eat I succeed fairly in drying my clothes at the camp-fire. During the afternoon we again strike bottom upon two or three occasions, and the experience of the morning is repeated.

That night we pull the boat up in a little cove and land on the ice, which is still three or four feet thick near the shore, although the snow has left the country except on the hilltops and in the cold ravines. It is an ideal place for a night's rest. There is a fresh breeze blowing from the river, but back in the woods among the firs the air scarcely stirs. It is hardly necessary to put up a tent. Goods must be moved so that the boat can be bailed, for she leaks a little and we cannot afford to have our provisions wet. Perhaps she received a slight strain on the rocks, although she is a stanch craft and it will take a hard blow to disable her. Blankets must be carried back to tent and a camp-fire built. Coffee is to be made, although most of our food, or at least enough for several days' rations, has been prepared beforehand.

Next morning we are awakened by the robins and that sweet sky songstress that seems out of place in this locality, the lark. I should perhaps state that we have already made the acquaintance of the Alaskan mosquito. He, or rather, she, made her appearance in society about the 1st of May, and I have had the pecky creatures bite me on the lake while it was covered with four feet of ice. Yet it cannot be truthfully stated that the Alaskan variety is any more pestiferous than the Jersey breed.

She is larger and more finely formed and her voice is more of the contralto order. She will likewise bite through thicker clothing, but in case of warfare she is less quick of movement than the Jersey breed and can be seen rather more easily and thus annihilated.

I have forgotten to mention one of our passengers—a modest well behaved fellow who walks the gangplank or swims aboard and is taken over the gunwales if more convenient. He commands universal respect and is one of the most quiet and orderly individuals aboard. I refer to our dog Collie. Farther back on the trail a dog called at our tent one morning and seemed so hungry and friendly that we resolved to buy him if possible for a camp dog. The owner proved to be in a tent not far away, and much to my delight seemed quite willing to part with him for a consideration.

But I soon found that he was not an honest dog. He had a habit of sticking his head into the openings of any of the tents he came across, neighboring or otherwise, and if nobody were at home he would rush in, grab the first thing he came across in the food line, preferably bacon, and dash away like a shot. Thus he became unpopular on the trail, and had his master not settled liberally for stolen food he would have achieved an unenviable reputation also. So after paying duty to the Canadian officials I was glad to turn him over to one of their mounted police, where he was to be used as a draft dog.

But one day we came across a Scotch collie dog lying beside the trail with a broken hind leg. He seemed so badly in need of friends and so willing to accept their offices that with the aid of two pieces of board and a rope we succeeded in straightening the broken member, making him more comfortable. By dint of threats and coaxings my wife and I took him to camp on a hand sled. In three days more he could move about easily, and on the fourth we took the splits off and allowed him to walk along behind our goods. A dog of better morals, better manners, of stricter integrity or of more wisdom it would be hard to find anywhere. He wears a white collar, which is always clean, a brown sack coat of the cutaway style and white pantaloons and shoes, and if we go back to civilization he shall go too.

Speaking of the curious sights one comes across on the trail, I am reminded of a four-week-old colt that passed along recently with its mother, which was patiently pulling the heavy load of a party of pioneers.

But we are approaching a canyon. The water sweeps along in ripples. Here are the pilots' headquarters, with several boats laden with big outfits waiting to be taken through. Just beyond is the walled gateway opening into the rocky dell. With difficulty we swing around into a cove and disembark for a purpose of making observations and finding out the extent of the difficulty and danger, if any. It has a less formidable appearance than we expected at this season of the year, and we go quickly back, push off and are soon sweeping down over the swift waters. In the prow of the boat stands a brawny Scotchman, erect head and throat bared and hair streaming in the wind. Somehow he reminds me of a viking of old. In the stern sits the man whom we have chosen to be captain and the only one who has been in the waters before. It takes a good deal of strength to keep a boat of the size of this in the center of the channel and away from the dangerous walls, but it glides through gracefully and easily, and before we have time to take much note of what is going on we shoot out into the opening beyond. I think the swiftness of the water and the dangers of this famous gorge have been somewhat exaggerated. Not so, however, with the White Horse rapids below, our experience in which must be reserved for another letter.

Does Baby Thrive?

If your baby is delicate and sickly and its food does not nourish it, put fifteen or twenty drops of Scott's Emulsion in its bottle three or four times a day and you will see a marked change.

We have had abundant proof that they will thrive on this emulsion when other food fails to nourish them.

It is the same with larger children that are delicate. Scott's Emulsion seems to be the element lacking in their food. Do not fail to try it if your children do not thrive. It is as useful for them in summer as in winter.

Ask your doctor if this is not true. SCOTT & BOWNE, Chemists, New York

FARMERS' INSTITUTE.

Talks of More than Ordinary Interest will Characterize the Meeting.

The summer session of the farmers' institute was held at Pittsfield center last week Tuesday. After the opening exercises, Mr. S. H. Todd, of Wakeman, delivered an address on "Early Maturity of Animals." He showed the importance of knowing how to feed as well as selecting the best kind for feeding; also, the great advantage of getting the animals ready for market as young as possible. Prof. Hickman, of the Wooster experiment station, delivered an address on "Sugar Beet Culture." He did not give the farmers much encouragement. He thought they had better go a little slow. At this juncture dinner was served by the ladies of the Congregational and M. E. Churches.

At the afternoon session Prof. Hickman gave an address on "Growing a Crop of Wheat," which was very interesting and instructive. He told of the different varieties they had tried at the station. Among the best was the Poole.

Mrs. Eddings, of Oberlin, read a paper on farm homes showing how the farmer was coming to the front. In fact her paper was good and well received.

Secretary Baker made a report of the financial situation of the society, after which a collection was taken amounting to about $12.00.

S. H. Todd gave a good talk on "Winter Lambing" showing the benefits that can be derived from this branch of agriculture.

The different topics were discussed by the farmers in a very practical way. One thing outside the topics was brought up with regard to the weeds and briars that are permitted to grow along the road side. Every farmer ought to have pride enough to see that they are cut.

The meeting was held in the Congregational church with a good attendance. Good music was interspersed through the program.

To Consumptives.

As an honest remedy, Foley's Honey and Tar does not hold out false hopes in advanced stages, but truthfully claims to give comfort and relief in the very worst cases, and in the early stages to effect a cure. W. H. Tisot & Co.

A Young Girl's Experience.

My daughter's nerves were terribly out of order. She was thin and weak; the least noise startled her, and she was wakeful at night. Before she had taken one package of Celery King, the change in her was so great that she could hardly be taken for the same girl. She is rapidly growing well and strong, her complexion is perfect, and she is growing well and strong.—Mrs. Lucy McNet, Brush Valley, Pa. Celery King for the nerves, stomach, liver, and kidneys is sold in 25c and 50c packages by E. W. Adams, Wellington; or Firestone & Sweet, Spencer.
